User Testing - PDP Optimization

Users struggled to make the connection between the bundle promotion and redeeming it using the bundles carousel.

Only one user expressed a clear understanding of the bundles carousel. 4 out of 5 users were not able to confidently answer the test question.

2 out of 5 users incorrectly assumed that there was no way to redeem the bundle promotion while on the PDP.

“I think the bundle promotion could be easier to understand. Like there could be like step one, add your color to your cart and then step two, add the bundle or something like that. Maybe if it walked you through what to do. Maybe it could show you all the different options that are included, that could be helpful.”

“So even though I already understood that this hair color is included in a discount and a bundle, having more details explained in a small font over here [in the tooltip] is very helpful.”

“What would I do to redeem the bundle? I guess go to the promotions area and redeem it?”

“I would probably go to the promo code section in checkout and I would expect the promo code to automatically pop up, assuming that I have the right products in my bag.”

Questions for Stakeholders:

- What are all the possible scenarios/types for bundle promos?
 - Simple bundle, no selections needed
 - Bundle where user has to choose a variant of one or more of the products
 - Is there ever a customizable “build your own bundle” scenario?
- Where are bundles usually displayed? Only on the PDP of a “main” item, or on the PDP of every item included in the bundle?
- Does anything happen if the user already has at least one of the bundle items already added to bag (messaging, leaving it out of the carousel, etc.)?
- Do we want something like this to function outside of PDPs, such as on the homepage or on a category landing page?
